Introducing children to picture books about death in the Primary School

In a generation, which has seen an explosion in the development of the picture book and a great diversity of themes addressed in these books, it is no wonder that a variety of books are now available which address the theme of loss. Because of the interplay of verbal and visual stimuli these materials can offer a powerful opening to discussion on challenging topics.

When a child is bereaved, adults including teachers, sometimes go looking for a book to explain things to a child. However this might not be the right time either for the bereaved child or his/her classmates to talk. It can be confronting. It can increase self-consciousness for the child. It can be very difficult to find the book that fits.

It can be helpful to think instead about where loss is already part of the curriculum and to avoid shying away from it as part of the overall learning of the child. In SPHE (Social, Personal and Health Education) for example, when exploring feelings we can use a picture book to initiate a discussion about the effects of loss on a character. Younger children might read Gentle Willow [Mills 2004] and talk about the sadness of the animals when the Willow Tree dies and how they planned to remember her. Senior classes might discuss Her Mother's Face [Doyle 2008] and talk about the struggles families experience as they grieve in different ways. In this way children explore the topic in a distance way and develop empathy and sensitivity, while no child is under pressure to share personal stories if they do not wish to.

In SESE (Social, Environmental and Scientific Education) children study life cycles so death is part of the conversation. A book such as The Lonely Tree [Halliday 2006] offers young children a chance to look at the life and death of an oak tree and allows them to integrate both cognitively and emotionally.

History is another subject where death can be part of the discussion and we have an opportunity to explore the impact of historical events on individual lives and communities. The book Sadako [Coerr 1997] for example tells the story of a child in Hiroshima who develops cancer in the aftermath of the atom bomb. It is a story of loss but also of friendship and community and ultimately a story of hope. The book can offer an integration of English, History, SPHE and Visual Art.

Exploring loss in the classroom is best done when nobody is recently bereaved but in recognition that death is part of life. Then when children have a language for loss and an understanding of its effects they will manage relationships with their peers with more sensitivity when a death occurs.

The ICBN book list on this website is a resource for teachers but we offer it with a word of caution. We ask you to become familiar with some of these books and to think carefully and critically about when you might use them with a class, an individual child or a parent.

ICBN Booklist: For children and their families who experience Bereavement

When families experience grief, it can be challenging to know how to talk to children about death. Books can help to open up discussion about death and finding the right books to support your child during bereavement can help to answer questions that can be challenging or difficult. The ICBN has compiled a list of children's books which may help both you and your child to better understand bereavement.

The booklist here is a resource for those who know or are working with bereaved children, but we offer it with a word of caution. We ask you to become familiar with some of these books and to think carefully and critically about when you might use them with a class, an individual child or a parent. The below table is a useful guide when considering whether to use a book in your classroom or to recommend it to a family.

Terminology	Meaning
Best for classroom use in conjunction with a curricular area	This book should be used in conjunction with the specified curricular area. Not all books might be suitable for your class. Always read the book before considering using it. Remember that you know your class best, and therefore, you are best placed to decide on whether a book is appropriate for your pupils.
Best for one-to-one reading with support	This book should be used with caution as the content is sensitive. We suggest that these books are recommended to parents or guardians or perhaps used (with permission from parents or guardians) in school with support.
Suitable for adults	Some picture books are suitable for adults and can provide comfort. We have identified what picture books on this list are suitable for adults.

Talking About Death and Bereavement in School: How to Help Children Aged 4 to 11 to Feel Supported and Understood by Ann Chadwick

Children experiencing bereavement are often confused, unprepared, and in need of help and support from those around them. It is important that school teachers and staff know how to respond to bereavement and how they can best help the child. This short, easy to read book offers simple but important advice and guidance for school teachers and staff on what to do when a child is grieving. It also stresses the importance of teaching the facts of death to children and includes ideas on how to incorporate this into lessons.
